Coproduced by the Opera of Oviedo and the Teatro Cervantes of Malaga, these two stage productions have been titled La edad de plata. Díptico español by the stage director Francisco Lopez as a clear tribute to some of the artists, intellectuals and literati of the first third of the twentieth century who played a leading role in one of the stellar moments of Spanish culture, and whose creative refuge was the city of Paris.

Goyescas o Los majos enamorados

Everything revolves around two women and two men, characters who recall those of Bizet's Carmen. Fernando, an aristocrat, and Paquiro, a bullfighter, vie for the love of the uninhibited Rosario. Pepa is the matador's accomplice to win the young woman's heart. The plot becomes so complicated that the two lovers challenge each other to a duel.

When Granados composed his famous series of pieces for piano, called Goyescas, he was inspired by one of Goya's amiable and optimistic paintings of majos and manolas in a luminous and idealised Madrid. Four years later, the composer asked Fernando Periquet to convert this material into an opera of the same name. In fact, Granados only orchestrated and vocalised the piano pieces, giving them a successive order in accordance with the libretto.

With very refined instrumentation and considerable dramatic entity, the 'Song of the Nightingale' and the interlude are two of the opera's very well-known passages.

El retablo de maese Pedro

Maese Pedro arrives at the same inn in La Mancha de Aragón where Don Quixote and Sancho are resting. The episode that Maese Pedro represents in his little theatre is a theme of chivalry from Spanish ballads: the rescue of Melisendra, held captive in Almanzor's prison in Sansueña (Sarragosa), by her husband Don Gaiferos. Don Quixote follows the performance calmly and attentively, commenting on the chivalrous scenes that attract him so much. But at the start of the pursuit of the lovers by the Moors, fearful that they are going to be captured, he violently 'enters' the plot and destroys the whole puppet troupe.

El retablo de maese Pedro, with music and libretto by Manuel de Falla, is based on Chapter 26 of the second part of Don Quixote. Musically, in this work the composer relinquishes his reiterated Andalusian colour to create a new neoclassical language, nonetheless with national references to the historical music of the Golden Age.
